Scenic trail along Guanacaste Strait to re-open on route of ruined century-old road

A 40-acre nature preserve along the scenic Guanacaste Strait has been closed to the public for nearly a decade due to concerns about its ecological fragility. However, after a rigorous evaluation and a detailed renovation process, the trail is now scheduled to re-open on March 15th.

The trail once served as a vital link for local residents, providing a scenic route for fishing and leisure activities. Unfortunately, years of exposure to the elements and human activities led to the deterioration of the trail, prompting its closure in 2012.

The renovation project involved the removal of invasive species, the installation of erosion controls, and the creation of eco-friendly pathways. These efforts have not only revitalized the trail but have also enhanced the overall biodiversity of the area.

For nature enthusiasts and local residents alike, the re-opening of the trail marks an important milestone in preserving and promoting the natural beauty of the Guanacaste Strait.
