

Diablo Foothills

HISTORY The first Spanish explorers into Contra Costa (1772) found Bay Miwok Indians living in the foothills of Mt. Diablo. The grasses and foothills of Mt. Diablo appealed to the Spaniards as potential ranchland. When the Mexican government took over California in 1821 it conferred huge land grants to the soldiers who marched with the explorers.

Dona Juana Sanchez de Pacheco was granted Rancho Arroyo de las Nueces y Bolbones (Creek of the Walnuts and Indians). Its acreage included the western slopes of Mt. Diablo and today's Diablo Foothills Regional Park.

DESCRIPTION Diablo Foothills offers abundant open land for hiking and nature study. The 1,024 acres of Diablo Foothills are bounded by two dramatic East Bay landforms: the Castle Rocks of Mt. Diablo and the undulating "camelback" ridges that form Shell Ridge. These ridges link the park to the City of Walnut Creek's Shell Ridge Open Space and Mt. Diablo State Park, which together represent of the largest open space area (about 23,000 acres) of the East Bay. Diablo Foothills also contains Castle Rock Regional Recreation Area, a 15-acre recreational facility serving central Contra Costa County.

NATURAL RESOURCES Vegetation varies from grassland and oak savannah on the hills to riparian and oak woodland in the valley. Pine Creek flows through Pine Canyon and is within the eastern portion of the Walnut Creek watershed, which drains 150 square miles of central Contra Costa County into San Francisco Bay.

Diverse habitat types support an equally diverse array of wildlife, including mule deer, bobcats, coyote, grey fox, long-tailed weasels, raccoons, gophers, rabbits, and ground squirrels. Birds such as red-winged blackbirds, northern mockingbirds, scrub jay, California quail, brown towhees, orioles, and woodpeckers use the park for nesting and foraging habitat. Rock outcrops shelter garter and gopher snakes, western fence lizards, southern alligator lizards, tree frogs and California salamanders. The perennial pools of water in Pine Creek ensure the survival of green sunfish, mosquitofish, and largemouth bass.

Castle Rock

Of special interest are the raptors that nest in the Castle Rocks. Golden eagles, red-tailed hawks and peregrine falcons nest in these striking sandstone formations and hunt for prey in Diablo Foothills. These Domingue sandstone formations occur through the central-northern portion of the park and form spectacular outcroppings just outside the park boundary.
